FAQ:

Do I really need to know the cases to speak Russian?

Short answer: Yes. You won't be able to speak Russian if you don't know the cases. People simply won't understand you.

Long answer: Yes. Russian is a very flexible language. The cases are the letters (endings) that are attached to nouns and adjectives to show what role this particular word plays in this sentence. It can be a subject, a direct or indirect object, denote location or absence of something, etc. These endings are the “lighthouses” for a Russian speaker that allow them to decipher what has been said or written.

What is the order of cases?

In the “Russian cases boot camp” course the cases are studied in the order of frequency of usage and their importance for speaking: prepositional, accusative, genitive, dative, instrumental.

Are we going to study all cases at once?

No, each workbook is dedicated to one Russian case.

Are we going to study the cases in plural as well?

Not right now. The course is about the cases in singular. A workbook for the cases in plural is coming soon.

Will you speak Russian in the videos?

All grammar explanations in the videos are in English. All examples are in Russian with the English translation.

What kind of tasks are there in the course?

- Grammar exercises for the case that we are studying at the moment
- Reading and listening comprehension (texts and dialogues)
- Writing tasks
- Speaking tasks (with the option to record yourself and send me the audio file).
